Basically you will be downloading an.ico to a folder and from there you'll copy the file to your icon and it'll change to match that theme. Or if you want to make an icon with the exact dimensions of a game icon you can use an app called PicMonkey. Q: How to make two Jenkins jobs share the same Git revision We have a project that is currently being developed in Git with master as a "develop branch" and a "release branch". I would like to setup Jenkins jobs for the release branch and the master branch to start out in the same revision and move forward as development happens. My plan is to clone the master branch of the Git repo to be the Jenkins job and then create a build job that will start at the same commit as the master branch. Has anybody done this before? A: The preferred way to do this (and it's what we've done) is to pull changes from a repository other than where they are being developed. The repository is a view of the repository, not a mirror. In your Jenkins configuration, you have two jobs: A CI job to build on the develop branch, which checks out the commit (the master branch) of the repository to the Jenkins server and then builds the project. A release branch job, which pulls from the same repository in a different branch, and builds the project. We sometimes use a pre-pull hook on the CI job to update the job to the right branch. In some projects, we've even had a CI job update its job to the latest commit in the upstream master branch.
