. Pcpdfwin jcpds software download.Q: Does a signal carry interference from inanimate objects? Will a TV have no problems receiving the signal from my cell phone 3 meters away if I are using the phone near a wall with the phone face down? Is interference affecting the signal enough to cause any problems for the TV signal? A: There is a well defined concept of line-of-sight path loss, and objects that are non-ideal reflectors can severely limit that, or even block the path entirely. A building, tree, etc. will prevent line-of-sight communication between points that are more than 6 times the dimensions of the shortest communication path. The exact number varies, as it depends on the materials of your building, tree, etc. You haven't given any information about the building in question, so I'm giving two examples. Building: In, say, a campus of buildings, you will have some loss of communication between towers in a building because of the floor plan. If two buildings are side-by-side, if you have one on the periphery of the campus and the other is down the street, you can lose significant communication between the two. Tree: Trees are less than ideal reflectors, but their large leaves can still block some line-of-sight communication. However, assuming you have trees on both sides of a street, an even number of trees on each side will block only half of the communication, and this will likely be almost as bad as having one tree on each side. If you're lucky, you may have only one tree on the edge of a campus or in the middle of a city. If you're not lucky, you may have a row of trees, which will severely limit communication. Trees also do not block line-of-sight communication effectively across long distances. Physical obstructions do affect the signal strength in an area, but it's more of an exponential loss on the length of the objects that are involved. You will likely see a lower level of signal where there is a less dense collection of such obstructions, and this relationship will not hold for objects that act as very good reflectors. For example, say you're down the street from a tall building, which doesn't block line-of-sight communication, but which acts as a reflector. The signal from another tower at the edge
