we enter the workshop for the first time. now this is the moment ive wanted to really beep this game for a long time. in the first one, at the beginning of the game, you enter a small workshop for the first time. it was a highlight for me at the time, and i always wanted to see that in more detail. it also gave me a glimpse at some, what i assume was, a screenshot of the game that couldnt be used because it was temporary art of some sort. yeah this game is pretty cool, i love how it incorporates the basics of building an automation in a fun and accessible way, it feels like a combination of having a company that you can build up (relatively easily, but with the many mechanics there is still a lot of pressure and work to do) and of being able to free roam and explore without the limitations that a single, narrow market like cork or gasoline imposes. the game is fun, and the best part is that i can play it everywhere, so i have more accessibility and less ownership. you just get the feeling that the designers were very much aware of the mobile market and deliberately did something to make the game easier to get your head around, its nothing the developers did to try to intentionally make the game hard, and that makes me like it a little more. overall, it feels like they put a lot of time and effort into this, and it shows. its a great little game, and i have already been looking into a sequel! chris lloyd of course, and an original game, with a name right there like that? what do you mean that sounds like a band? thats the first of at least a dozen jokes that ive already had while playing this, and i have no idea where any of them are going. chris lloyd is on a lark here, so no one is expecting anything great, but i can tell he has something up his sleeve, and maybe it isnt even a joke. either way, automation the car company tycoon game is a really interesting game, and it hits a lot of the good notes. its not a robot, its not a car, it isnt even a game as much as it is a little puzzle, and it is really quite entertaining.
